

How is "Public Policy" Used in HCI Scholarship?

Ritika Gairola
UXP2 Lab
Indiana University
Bloomington, Indiana, USA
rgairola@iu.edu

Colin M. Gray
UXP2 Lab
Indiana University
Bloomington, Indiana, USA
comgray@iu.edu

Abstract

Over the past decade, there has been a growing interest in integrating public policy into HCI scholarship. Despite this increased attention, HCI researchers and policy professionals have not fully explored the potential of this collaboration and public policy remains an underrepresented stakeholder in HCI discussions. In this study, we report on a systematic literature review describing the use of “public policy” in HCI literature from 2014-2024 at CHI, DIS, and CSCW. Using inductive coding and reflexive thematic analysis, we highlight how public policy is employed as a concept, revealing that the term public policy is used in numerous ways that range from being a strong voice at the forefront of the discussion to a background concept that lacks strong articulation of future scope or direction. We identify ways to strengthen connections between HCI and Policy, laying the groundwork for stronger policy discussions and outcomes.

CCS Concepts

• Social and professional topics → Computing / technology policy; • Human-centered computing;

Keywords

public policy, systematic review, regulation

ACM Reference Format:

Ritika Gairola and Colin M. Gray. 2025. How is "Public Policy" Used in HCI Scholarship?. In Extended Abstracts of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems (CHI EA '25), April 26–May 01, 2025, Yokohama, Japan. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 8 pages. <https://doi.org/10.1145/3706599.3719997>

1 Introduction

HCI is an inter-discipline [11] with a range of “big” questions that require different kinds of disciplinary perspectives to be considered [5, 24, 33]. HCI scholarship is widely recognized for drawing from various domains and this inter- and trans-disciplinary approach is one of HCI’s defining features, allowing researchers to address complex interactions between people and technology from multiple perspectives. As Liu et al. [50] note: “The only tradition in HCI is that of having no tradition,” highlighting HCI’s dynamic and evolving nature characterized by its fluidity and openness to new ideas and approaches. While HCI has continually evolved, placing users and society at the core of research and design processes has been a persistent goal [2]. Recently, this dialogue has expanded to emphasize the importance of integrating public policy as a central concern for HCI contributions rather than treating policy as a peripheral consideration [85].

The HCI community recognized its ability to shape policy as early as 1998 [35], raising significant questions such as: “Is specialized expertise in Human-Computer Interaction—beyond general computer expertise—valuable in technology policymaking?” [40]. Jackson et al. [37] continued to ask relevant questions like “Can CSCW research influence science policy? Should it?” These scholars also explored why science policy needs CSCW, highlighting that “science policy frameworks have tended to emphasize sociological or natural drivers of change, to the general neglect of the crucial relationship between tools and everyday practices of work—something CSCW has a great deal to say about.” While these contributions were—and are—significant in identifying the potential of HCI scholarship to influence policy, how to integrate and leverage the HCI–Public Policy relationship remained unclear. Public policy was brought to the forefront as an active participant in 2014 [36] with the introduction of the knot model to understand the relationships among policy, practice, and design that collectively shape the trajectory of social computing. Jackson et al. [36] discussed this intersection to expand the reach, depth, and impact of HCI scholarship. Building on this foundation, HCI researchers began engaging more actively with policymakers to highlight the impact of the digital landscape on society [72]. Over time, social computing scholarship continued to focus on bridging the gap between technical designs and social practices, a goal that aligns closely with public policy objectives [36, 63]. By 2024, the relationship between HCI and policy was re-imagined to amplify HCI’s voice in the policy realm, recognizing the importance of integrating policy considerations more centrally within HCI research [85].

In this late-breaking work (LBW) we report on a systematic review of references to public policy in HCI literature from 2014 to 2024, identifying trends and opportunities that can advance this collaboration between HCI researchers and policymakers. We selected three leading venues that have been in the forefront of this multifaceted research in HCI: CHI, CSCW, and DIS. We performed a search on the ACM Digital Library and screened the resulting literature to include research articles that mentioned the phrase “public policy” in different ways and contexts. Based on the excerpts identified in each paper, we used an inductive coding process [65] and reflective thematic analysis approach [13] to construct different themes and characterize this literature based on each paper’s use of the phrase, its frequency of mention, placement, research context, and interpretation.

Permission to make digital or hard copies of all or part of this work for personal or classroom use is granted without fee provided that copies are not made or distributed for profit or commercial advantage and that copies bear this notice and the full citation on the first page. Copyrights for third-party components of this work must be honored. For all other uses, contact the owner/author(s).

CHI EA '25, Yokohama, Japan

© 2025 Copyright held by the owner/author(s).

ACM ISBN 979-8-4007-1395-8/25/04

<https://doi.org/10.1145/3706599.3719997>

Our contributions in this LBW are two-fold. First, we highlight the current understanding of the phrase “public policy” by constructing and evaluating dominant themes in the use and framing of public policy within HCI literature from 2014-2024 at CHI, DIS, and CSCW. Our findings provide insight into the roles and representation of public policy and demonstrate nuanced conceptualizations of the term as a concept, tool, or process across various layers: background, midground, foreground, and indeterminate. Second, we offer provocations for future researchers to foster a reciprocal relationship between HCI researchers and policymakers to design user-centered technical and policy solutions that prioritize user well-being.

2 Method

The methodology of this systematic literature review was guided by recommendations from the PRISMA 2020 statement [60]. The review procedure started with identifying and screening the literature to be included in our analysis, summarized in Figure 1. The research team consists of two researchers: Ritika has a legal background and experience in policy implementation, as well as coursework in policy studies, and Colin has extensive experience working closely with policymakers in the US and EU on a variety of projects. The research team iteratively screened and reviewed the data to better understand: How do HCI scholars use the term “public policy,” and what are the trends in its usage over the past 10 years? To achieve this goal, we constructed themes to capture patterns in the usage and context of the phrase, including its references as a discipline, a document, a process, or a metric. For example, the phrase “public policy” has been used as one of the many disciplines that share concepts with HCI [59]; a type of profession/discipline influenced by particular opinions and perspectives [66]; and a metric to extend the scope of research, incorporating best practices by translating them into the HCI literature [6]. Through iterative analysis of 645 excerpts, we developed open codes across all included literature (n=305) to capture and analyze the subtleties of the term “public policy” within HCI research. We then used reflexive thematic analysis [13] to further analyze excerpts that referenced “public policy,” constructing themes that captured a diverse range of interpretations and understanding of the term in the HCI literature.

2.1 Search Strategy and Screening

We conducted an advanced search in the ACM Digital Library, beginning with a search for the term “policy” that resulted in 69,486 articles. To create a more tractable sample, we recognized that “policy” is referenced in diverse contexts such as AI and privacy that are better addressed with the narrower term “public policy”; this approach also excluded alternate interpretations of policy such as insurance or management policies that were less relevant for our goals. We then conducted another advanced search on the ACM Digital Library, using the search string “public policy” (without quotation marks) in the Title field over the past five years at three leading HCI venues: CHI, CSCW, and DIS. This search resulted in 105 papers (CHI n=15; DIS n=15; CSCW n=36). We downloaded all the results as BibTeX and loaded these entries to Rayyan.ai, an online collaborative tool for systematic reviews. From our initial review and sensitization to the literature, we identified no duplicates, and found that the terms “public” and “policy” were mostly used in a literal sense, related to concepts such as public service, public display, and privacy policy, among others. To refine our search and include influential works such as the Jackson et al. [36] “policy knot” paper, we expanded our search strategy to include a wider time range, from January 2014 to June 2024, and used the search string “public policy” (with quotation marks) in the Anywhere field of the ACM Digital Library. We limited the search to papers published at CHI, CSCW, or DIS, resulting in the final data set of 309 papers (CHI n=171; DIS n=14; CSCW n=124). We then began screening by searching for the term “public policy” within each paper to confirm its presence. Three papers were excluded because the term, while perhaps present in the metadata, was not found in the published text. Among the included 305 papers, we created 673 excerpts containing the term “public policy” in the context in which it appeared in the paper. We proceeded to analyze these excerpts in Dovetail, a qualitative analysis tool, to understand how the phrase “public policy” was interpreted in different contexts and research framings.

2.2 Analysis Strategy

We used a first-cycle open coding approach [65] to characterize the framing and use of public policy in each excerpt. Through this process, we generated almost 100 unique codes, including excerpts describing public policy as a profession or discipline (n=124), referenced articles (n=77), one of many disciplines that the research project touched on or could impact (n=63), use as a CCS concept or keyword (n=61), a type of document (n=32), or a description of a research participant (n=26). To further analyze the included literature using reflexive thematic analysis [13], we evaluated each excerpt containing the phrase “public policy,” closely read the relevant portion to understand the context, and used the previously applied open codes across these selected portions to understand the usage, placement, and context of the research. Through conversation between the researchers, we constructed and iterated upon a set of themes that elucidated the nuances of uses of public policy in HCI literature that we observed.

Through these discussions and a process of memoing based on our analysis of these data and related codes, we identified four layers reflecting the integration of ‘public policy’ by HCI scholars: background, midground, foreground, and indeterminate. We observed that, although recognition of the potential for HCI-policy engagement is growing, deep integration is still in its early stages. There is significant potential for dialogue on how designers can both contribute to and learn from policymakers. Each layer of this engagement has its strengths and challenges; our goal is to highlight existing collaborations and encourage future scholars to explore ways to sustain and expand this dialogue, fostering a more holistic approach. Our focus is on enhancing participation at the foreground, exploring reciprocal relationships that help mitigate user risks and harms through the intersection of technology and policy design.

3 Findings

HCI is an interdisciplinary space with many different perspectives, forms of knowledge, concepts and theories, and priorities [33, 64]. The call for HCI researchers to engage with public policy is not new to HCI [17] and public policy has previously shaped HCI research in many areas such as accessibility and data privacy [19, 49] and policy and technology have also mutually shaped each other [53]. While opportunities for collaboration across research fields have advanced significantly, and our analysis reveals that public policy is acknowledged as a significant participant in HCI discussions in various forms and capacities but there is a need for further exploration on how to translate this participation into practical outcomes. For instance, there has been a rise in legal [51] and social computing [44] scholarship about the consumer protection and impact of technology on society, which calls for greater attention to how policies and design can better inform one another. Despite having a shared goal “...to understand people’s values, behaviors, societal processes, and interactions with and experiences of emergent technologies”[85] there is a disconnect between the two fields that may have contributed to the perception that policies are reactive and less dynamic as compared to technology [36]. Additionally, Sowon et al. [71] “demonstrate[d] how even well-intentioned regulations can have unintended consequences”. Thus there is a need to leverage this involvement to simultaneously design technology and policy [84].

Figure 1: Systematic review PRISMA diagram describing our identification, screening, and inclusion process.

We organize our findings into three themes that highlight the scope of the (potentially) symbiotic relationship between technology and policy, as reflected in HCI scholarship:

3.1 Unlocking Potential: HCI Scholars Recognize the Potential for Mutual Influence between HCI and Public Policy

HCI scholars have recognized that public policy and HCI can mutually shape each other, recognizing that the environments in which technologies and policies are designed and operationalized matter [72]. Public policy has increasingly being acknowledged as one important “building block” in the HCI literature alongside other interdisciplinary perspectives [11]. We found that, although HCI scholars engage with policy professionals, as reflected in the backgrounds of authors [21], collaborators [47], and participants [1], the depth of these engagements is unclear and sometimes superficial. Despite public policy being recognized as a relevant issue, nearly 35 papers in our dataset only included the term as a keyword without integrating it into the main body of the paper. This disconnect was particularly noticeable in research areas such as privacy [25], adolescent online safety [28], child safety [83], cyberbullying [82], social justice [74], content moderation and ethics [55], and AI decision-making and fairness [9].

3.2 Expanding Horizons: HCI Scholars Reflect Upon the Interdisciplinary Scope Common to HCI and Policy

HCI as a discipline has been appreciated and understood for its strength in interdisciplinarity. As Blackwell [11] argues, the “[...] function of HCI is to be questioning, provocative, disruptive and awkward in relation to other disciplines—particularly in relation to those disciplines that underlie our professional affiliations.” As an example of this commitment, public policy was often used to broker meaningful interdisciplinary collaboration in relation to HCI research themes. Public policy has served as an intersection between HCI and environmental issues [10]. For instance, in the context of environmental public policy, Thomas et al. [75] addresses and explores “how and why the HCI community might engage with public policy.” Other scholars have framed the relationship between HCI and public policy as multidisciplinary [50], where different research groups bring in and contribute different perspectives. Just as “HCI is indisputably a multidisciplinary field”[50], public policy also traverses diverse fields, offering different lenses through which key issues in HCI research can be addressed. Some recurring research frames and interpretations of public policy identified in our analysis include:

- Privacy: Public policy was often considered within the context of human safety, playing a role in describing users' perceptions towards privacy [68]. Marsch et al. [54] explains how privacy research, and particularly "location permission has typically received the most research and public policy attention" while Habib et al. [32] discusses policy implications resulting from the legal and regulatory requirements for privacy mechanisms. We observed that HCI researchers tend to consider public policy within the context of human safety, addressing issues like cyberbullying [82], adolescent online safety [27, 81], and internet-connected devices like toys [57] or IoT [22].
- Artificial Intelligence: AI and machine learning research primarily referenced public policy in relation to fairness. As noted by van Nuenen et al. [78], "algorithmic fairness thus looms large in public policy circles, academia, and the press." Responsible AI tools have also made significant contribution to various fields, including HCI and public policy in combination with value-related framings such as fairness [6]. HCI scholars who have explored this intersection have examined how public policy is influenced by the increasing involvement of algorithms, including its role in decision-making processes [4] and machine learning models [34].
- Government and Regulation: In the context of participatory governance research, public policy has been considered a key factor in addressing social and political issues along governance. For instance, Erete and Burrell [23] discuss how "complex, underlying issues such as the impact of race, class, and power on public policy and local governance." We also observed that HCI researchers believe that they can influence policy as "research can be leveraged in a variety of ways in the areas of political science and public policy" [87].
- Design: Public policy has been used to problematize the goals and values of designers. For instance, Gray et al. [30] identified designer intent as one potential intersection between the designer's world and public policy, while Kirkham [44] explains that, while regulators focused on human rights and value-sensitive designers share similar goals and values, they pursue them through different approaches. We identified a tension in nomenclature, where regulators use the terminology of rights rather than values, and more frequently play a crucial role in shaping public policy through court decisions as compared to designers [44].
- Informatics: In the context of misinformation, public policy was referred to as a discipline that had the tools or power address the sources and impacts of sharing false or misleading content, with impacts on both public health and public policy [7]. Additionally, public policy was interpreted as an area that needs improvement to ensure safety against targeted misinformation campaigns [43].

3.3 Adapting to Contexts: HCI Scholars Explore the Flexible Roles that HCI and Public Policy Can Inhabit

HCI and public policy are both recognized as multidisciplinary fields that draw from diverse literature, and neither has a fixed or universally agreed-upon definition. Public policy, like HCI, takes on different meanings and foci based on the perspectives and application domains of different researchers. We identified how HCI researchers' understanding and use of public policy in their work was influenced by their unique backgrounds and disciplinary points of view, resulting in multiple interpretations of public policy:

- A lens: Public policy has served as a valuable lens and as an evaluative framework [77]. For example, focusing on public policy can help researchers to evaluate the socio-technical aspects of online discussions [3], explore challenges within the sharing economy [20], understand how engagement between policy and HCI can address challenges faced by gig workers [67], examine the depth and scope of policy impacts on low-income communities [23], and consider the consequences of abusive behavior in online environments [76].
- An influence mechanism: Public policy was regarded as an external and dynamic force that impacts how people interact with and trust technology. For instance, in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic, Kowalewski et al. [46] "[...] found people's perception of COVID-19 apps to change over time, particularly due to the influence of external effects such as trust in institutions and public policy [...]."
- A social instrument: Researchers referred to public policy as a social context [86] or as part of the social dynamics that should be understood when exploring broader socially-focused topics such as homelessness [12]. Other researchers highlighted the utility of public policy in shaping engagement, as "public policy influences technical design and social practices around moderation tools for creators" [39].
- A planning tool: Public policy was discussed in the context of urban aesthetics [62], smart cities [56], and town planning [69] as a key component in community planning since planning decisions aimed at addressing social needs and incorporating the perspectives of marginalized communities rely on the integration of policy into the planning process [18]. As one example of public policy being used as a planning tool, Soden et al. [69] highlighted intersections of urban planning and policy, noting that "floodplain maps that shape much of public policy around urban planning and preparedness are created through collaboration between experts with backgrounds in hydrology, engineering, and cartography."
- A tool for collective action: Public policy was framed as a tool for advocacy, supporting consideration of diverse perspectives, multi-stakeholder collaboration, and intersectional issues such as trust, policy, and designer intent [30]. Biedermann et al. [8] emphasized the role of citizen engagement in shaping public policy and informing future development of technology.
- A socially-engaged practice: Public policy was referenced as a decision-making process that was situated in a social context [4, 41, 61]. This social and interactive process involves actors such as governments and advocacy groups, with an emphasis on social interactions and needs. For instance, in discussions of algorithmic risk assessments and decision making, Green and Chen [31] highlight that this balancing act is not merely a technical or practical issue but also involves ethical and societal implications, requiring one to “strike the appropriate balance between the conflicting goals embedded in public policy” [31].

4 Discussion and Implications

Our analysis shows that the intersection of HCI and Public Policy is a double-edged sword: while mutually interdependent, this relationship is amorphous and ever-evolving due to the lack of fixed definitions and the interdisciplinary nature of both fields. In the best of cases, this fluidity is beneficial, allowing researchers to conduct research and build resources in transdisciplinary ways across various domains [11, 30, 33]. However, the lack of a unified language and consistent definitions can lead to confusion, making communication difficult, negotiations unclear, and responsibility fragmented, as the interpretation of “public policy” varies depending on the research context.

4.1 Policy’s Capacity for Collaboration

Through this analysis, we identified four layers that represent the different capacities in which public policy participates in HCI scholarship:

- A. Background: Public policy is positioned in a way that shows relevance to HCI work, but lacks specificity—often positioning policy in the “background”. Common patterns of this type of participation include the use of public policy as a keyword, but no follow-up in the main text [25, 28, 82, 83]; a mention of a participant, collaborator, or related background in policy but without further detail [1, 21, 47, 58]; or the inclusion of public policy alongside many other perspectives or fields in a list [38, 45]. This background participation could be strengthened by including stakeholders with policy expertise or by linking HCI concepts to one or more relevant policy concepts.
- B. Midground: Public policy was brought closer to the mid-ground by including one or more forms of enrichment. Common patterns of this type of participation include the translation of an aspect of public policy as a concept or a process that can be leveraged to support HCI work. However, this inclusion of concept or process was not a central or key part of the discussion, with common uses including: describing relationships between technical expertise and public policy [70]; integrating policy perspectives by borrowing frameworks [79] or concepts [15]; identifying shared interests in addressing complex topics such as AI [78]; or illustrating policy as a point of intersection between HCI and environmental issues [10]. The mid-ground could be strengthened by incorporating policy scholarship as an equal partner, or by identifying bidirectional opportunities for knowledge contributions.
- C. Foreground: Public policy is framed as an equal partner with HCI positioned as a foreground participant, incorporating mutual benefits for policy and HCI communities. Common patterns of this type include: acknowledging the mutual influence and benefits [53]; demonstrating integration of policy, practice, and design (i.e., the policy knot) [36]; highlighting the need to advance the intersection between these two fields [48, 85] and proposing gaps the fields could address together [63]; introducing bridging concepts to enhance collaboration and smooth translational barriers [16]; and using HCI and policy perspectives to address environmental issues [75]. HCI and public policy could further leverage this engagement through the reciprocal exchange of tools, concepts, and shared objectives in designing technical and policy solutions that prioritize users and the public.

- D. Indeterminate: Due to the lack of a clear definition or shared understanding, HCI scholars have drawn on concepts from the field of public policy but have referred to them using different terms, such as policy and standards, privacy and compliance, roles and responsibilities, processes, and guidelines [42]. This participation often aligns ethics, legal and policy perspectives [14]. However, this engagement falls outside the scope of this literature review.

HCI scholars have previously collaborated with policy stakeholders across different capacities by identifying extent of overlapping social interests and recognizing their roles as co-authors, collaborators, and participants. There are some illustrative examples of where public policy has been in the foreground as HCI scholars have successfully integrated system-people-policy interactions. For instance, privacy regulations led by the US Federal Trade Commission and a proposal for dark patterns to be banned through the US DETOUR Act [80] are examples of where prior practice-led research in HCI has formed clear and bi-directional connections with policy, creating new transdisciplinary integration opportunities [85].

As new technologies emerge, they often outpace social practices and formal norms. To keep up with this evolution, a tighter collaboration between HCI and public policy stakeholders at the foreground may challenge both designers and policymakers to rethink potential solutions that can accommodate these social changes [36]. Finally, HCI scholars have questioned the linearity of technology and policy relations [36, 85]. Often, new technology is embraced first, with public policy being considered only later as a form of damage control—and our work demonstrates how HCI research can be used to stimulate and support proactive policymaking in addition to augmenting areas of policy that are well established.

4.2 Opportunities for Integration and Future Work

Our findings suggest that public policy is not new to HCI scholars and the evolving tech regulation debate underscores the need to strengthen HCI-policy collaboration. HCI scholars have previously emphasized the importance of translational science as a mechanism to enhance collaboration and smooth the barriers across disciplines and stakeholders [16], we urge interdisciplinary researchers in HCI, public policy, and social computing to collaborate on designing technology and policy together. Doing so promises to foster effective translation [84] and a shared and inclusive voice [52] that enables us to address common goals by aligning the types of evidence needed and the modes of communication and collaboration that are most beneficial to all stakeholders.

Forlizzi [26] previously argued that HCI should evolve beyond a focus on individual users and shift towards designing for communities and stakeholders, “[...] consider[ing] people as a critical portion of a technology system, and think[ing] about economics, transactions, and even policies and laws beyond the computer”—and stronger integration between HCI and public policy could represent a significant step in this direction. In recent work, Sowon et al. [71] also proposed that adopting design as a mindset may help create policies that are better suited to the real world, which links well with an understanding of design that is also core to HCI scholarship [29, 73]. We propose that interdisciplinary HCI researchers are well-positioned to expand design theory and methods at the intersection of policy, practice, and design, fostering a reciprocal exchange that advocates for proactive, people-centered views of technology and policy, while balancing technical feasibility, design values, business goals, government processes, and public interests—all while prioritizing user well-being.

Future research could expand our dataset to explore the relationship between policy and HCI, including more HCI venues and instances where ‘policy’ or alternative terms are used. It could also incorporate additional policy perspectives to identify areas of alignment, tension, and opportunity. HCI and policy researchers could collaborate to review policy research, understanding how policy professionals perceive HCI-policy collaboration, whether they use HCI concepts or methods, and how these resources impact their work. Future work should also engage with the significant complexity that the intersection of these two fields might entail, including both the potential for unintended harms and forms of manipulation or deception that can be anticipated in advance (e.g., dark patterns; surveillance capitalism). Scholars working at the intersection of HCI and policy might consider leading conversations about why well-intentioned technology and policies can have unintended consequences, provoking deeper inquiry into questions such as: How do technology designers and policymakers assess harm? What different forms of knowledge do UX practitioners and policymakers contend with or utilize to support their work? and How do these different knowledge forms interact? By combining insights across our review from this paper and future work, we may build a better understanding of how design concepts and methods from HCI might be used as a tool for policymakers, while also allowing HCI researchers to better understand policymaking realities and identify areas where our community can learn from and support policy traditions. At the end, a stronger collaboration may not completely eliminate all ethical and security problems, but, as Sowon et al. [71] notes, “...it can help to identify the most pressing ... problems before governments spend time and treasure to implement regulations or programs that may not fit the real world.”

5 Conclusion

In this LBW, we have described how HCI scholarship frequently intersects with public policy through borrowed concepts or shared interests, but is often used the background. Our findings suggest that a robust collaboration between the two fields has not yet been fully realized, but by developing shared resources, interdisciplinary researchers spanning these fields can strengthen collaboration across shared interests and achieve more integrated outcomes. We call upon the HCI and policy communities to explore models for stronger collaboration, fostering more effective engagement and leveraging the combined insights of both fields to design technology and policy solutions that prioritize user well-being.

References

- [1] Imtiaz Ahmad, Rosta Farzan, Apu Kapadia, and Adam J Lee. 2020. Tangible privacy: Towards user-centric sensor designs for bystander privacy. Proc. ACM Hum. Comput. Interact. 4, CSCW2 (Oct. 2020), 1–28. doi:10.1145/3415187
- [2] Liam Bannon. 2011. Reimagining HCI. interactions 18, 4 (July 2011), 50–57. doi:10.1145/1978822.1978833
- [3] Jeffrey Bardzell, Guo Freeman, Shaowen Bardzell, and Pei-Ying Chen. 2020. Join.Love: A sociotechnical genealogy of the legalization of same-sex marriage. In Proceedings of the 2020 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3313831.3376603
- [4] Ghassan F Bati and Vivek K Singh. 2018. “trust us”: Mobile phone use patterns can predict individual trust propensity. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173904
- [5] Jordan Beck and Erik Stolterman. 2017. Reviewing the big questions literature: Or, should HCI have big questions?. In Proceedings of the 2017 Conference on Designing Interactive Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3064663.3064673
- [6] Glen Berman, Nitesh Goyal, and Michael Madaio. 2024. A scoping study of evaluation practices for responsible AI tools: Steps towards effectiveness evaluations. In Proceedings of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems, Vol. 2022. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–24. doi:10.1145/3613904.3642398
- [7] Md Momen Bhuiyan, Amy X Zhang, Connie Moon Sehat, and Tanushree Mitra. 2020. Investigating differences in crowdsourced news credibility assessment: Raters, tasks, and expert criteria. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 4, CSCW2 (Oct. 2020), 1–26. doi:10.1145/3415164
- [8] Paul Biedermann, Jorgos Coenen, Dries De Roeck, and Andrew Vande Moere. 2023. PosterTalk: Expanding participatory agency in public survey platforms via middle-out gatekeeping. In Proceedings of the 2023 ACM Designing Interactive Systems Conference. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 2573–2592. doi:10.1145/3563657.3595984
- [9] Reuben Binns, Max Van Kleek, Michael Veale, Ulrik Lyngs, Jun Zhao, and Nigel Shadbolt. 2018. ‘it’s reducing a human being to a percentage’: Perceptions of justice in algorithmic decisions. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173951
- [10] Aksel Bjørn-Hansen and Maria Håkansson. 2018. Building momentum: Scaling up change in community organizations. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173984
- [11] Alan F Blackwell. 2015. HCI as an Inter-Discipline. In Proceedings of the 33rd Annual ACM Conference Extended Abstracts on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2702613.2732505
- [12] Chris Bopp and Amy Volda. 2023. “Showing the Context”: A need for oligopticonic information systems in homelessness measurement. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 7, CSCW1 (April 2023), 1–24. doi:10.1145/3579622
- [13] Virginia Braun and Victoria Clarke. 2021. Thematic Analysis: A Practical Guide. SAGE.
- [14] Inha Cha, Ajit G Pillai, and Richmond Y Wong. 2024. Ethics pathways: A design activity for reflecting on ethics engagement in HCI research. In Designing Interactive Systems Conference. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3643834.3660714
- [15] Ti-Chung Cheng, Tiffany Wenting Li, Yi-Hung Chou, Karrie Karahalios, and Hari Sundaram. 2021. I can show what I really like: Eliciting Preferences via Quadratic Voting. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW1 (April 2021), 1–43. doi:10.1145/3449281
- [16] Lucas Colusso, Ridley Jones, Sean A Munson, and Gary Hsieh. 2019. A Translational Science Model for HCI. In Proceedings of the 2019 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems (CHI '19). ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3290605.3300231
- [17] Rob Comber and Chiara Rossitto. 2023. Regulating responsibility: Environmental sustainability, law, and the platformisation of waste management. In Proceedings of the 2023 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems, Vol. 1. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–19. doi:10.1145/3544548.3581493
- [18] Jessa Dickinson, Mark Díaz, Christopher A Le Dantec, and Sheena Erete. 2019. The cavalry ain’t coming in to save us: Supporting Capacities and Relationships through Civic Tech. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 3, CSCW (Nov. 2019), 1–21. doi:10.1145/3359225
- [19] Tawanna R Dillahunt, Alex Jiahong Lu, and Joanna Velazquez. 2023. Eliciting alternative economic futures with working-class detroiters: Centering afrofuturism in speculative design. In Proceedings of the 2023 ACM Designing Interactive Systems Conference. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3563657.3596011
- [20] Tawanna R Dillahunt and Amelia R Malone. 2015. The promise of the sharing economy among disadvantaged communities. In Proceedings of the 33rd Annual ACM Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2702123.2702189
- [21] Carl DiSalvo, Tom Jenkins, and Thomas Lodato. 2016. Designing speculative civics. In Proceedings of the 2016 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing

- Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2858036.2858505
- [22] Pardis Emami-Naeini, Henry Dixon, Yuvraj Agarwal, and Lorrie Faith Cranor. 2019. Exploring how privacy and security factor into IoT device purchase behavior. In Proceedings of the 2019 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3290605.3300764
- [23] Sheena Erete and Jennifer O Burrell. 2017. Empowered participation: How citizens use technology in local governance. In Proceedings of the 2017 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3025453.3025996
- [24] Anthony Faiola. 2007. The Design Enterprise: Rethinking the HCI Education Paradigm. Design Issues 23, 3 (July 2007), 30–45. doi:10.1162/desi.2007.23.3.30
- [25] Casey Fiesler and Blake Hallinan. 2018. We are the product: Public reactions to online data sharing and privacy controversies in the media. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173627
- [26] Jodi Forlizzi. 2018. Moving beyond user-centered design. Interactions 25, 5 (Aug. 2018), 22–23. doi:10.1145/3239558
- [27] Arup Kumar Ghosh, Karla Badillo-Urquiola, Shion Guha, Joseph J LaViola, Jr, and Pamela J Wisniewski. 2018. Safety vs. Surveillance: What children have to say about mobile apps for parental control. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173698
- [28] Arup Kumar Ghosh, Karla Badillo-Urquiola, Mary Beth Rosson, Heng Xu, John M Carroll, and Pamela J Wisniewski. 2018. A matter of control or safety?: Examining parental use of technical monitoring apps on teens' mobile devices. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173768
- [29] John D Gould and Clayton Lewis. 1985. Designing for usability: key principles and what designers think. Commun. ACM 28, 3 (March 1985), 300–311. doi:10.1145/3166.3170
- [30] Colin M Gray, Jingle Chen, Shruthi Sai Chivukula, and Liyang Qu. 2021. End user accounts of dark patterns as felt manipulation. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW2 (Oct. 2021), 1–25. doi:10.1145/3479516
- [31] Ben Green and Yiling Chen. 2021. Algorithmic risk assessments can alter human decision-making processes in high-stakes government contexts. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW2 (Oct. 2021), 1–33. doi:10.1145/3479562
- [32] Hana Habib, Sarah Pearman, Jiamin Wang, Yixin Zou, Alessandro Acquisti, Lorrie Faith Cranor, Norman Sadeh, and Florian Schaub. 2020. "It's a scavenger hunt": Usability of Websites' Opt-Out and Data Deletion Choices. In Proceedings of the 2020 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3313831.3376511
- [33] Steve Harrison, Phoebe Sengers, and Deborah Tatar. 2011. Making epistemological trouble: Third-paradigm HCI as successor science. Interacting with computers 23, 5 (Sept. 2011), 385–392. doi:10.1016/j.intcom.2011.03.005
- [34] Amy K Heger, Liz B Marquis, Mihaela Vorvoreanu, Hanna Wallach, and Jennifer Wortman Vaughan. 2022. Understanding machine learning practitioners' data documentation perceptions, needs, challenges, and desiderata. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 6, CSCW2 (Nov. 2022), 1–29. doi:10.1145/3555760
- [35] Austin Henderson. 1998. HCI/SIGCHI issues for Policy '98. In CHI 98 Conference Summary on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/286498.286843
- [36] Steven J Jackson, Tarleton Gillespie, and Sandy Payette. 2014. The policy knot: re-integrating policy, practice and design in cscw studies of social computing. In Proceedings of the 17th ACM conference on Computer supported cooperative work & social computing (CSCW '14). Association for Computing Machinery, New York, NY, USA, 588–602. doi:10.1145/2531602.2531674
- [37] Steven J Jackson, Stephanie B Steinhart, and Ayse Buyuktur. 2013. Why CSCW needs science policy (and vice versa). In Proceedings of the 2013 conference on Computer supported cooperative work. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2441776.2441902
- [38] Taru Jain and Preeti Mudliar. 2024. Platforming PCOS Treatment Online: FemTech Logics of Care. In Proceedings of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–18. doi:10.1145/3613904.3642882
- [39] Shagun Jhaver, Quan Ze Chen, Detlef Knauss, and Amy X Zhang. 2022. Designing word filter tools for creator-led comment moderation. In CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3491102.3517505
- [40] Jeff Johnson, Ben Shneiderman, Elliot Soloway, Austin Henderson, and Barbara Simons. 1999. SIGCHI's role in influencing technology policy. In CHI '99 extended abstracts on Human factors in computing systems - CHI '99. ACM Press, New York, New York, USA. doi:10.1145/632716.632932
- [41] Alex Kale, Matthew Kay, and Jessica Hullman. 2019. Decision-making under uncertainty in research synthesis: Designing for the garden of forking paths. In Proceedings of the 2019 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3290605.3300432
- [42] Thanika Kanying, Sotarath Thammaboosadee, and Rojjalak Chuckpawong. 2023. Formulating analytical governance frameworks: An integration of data and AI governance approaches. In Proceedings of the 13th International Conference on Advances in Information Technology. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3628454.3628461
- [43] Sadia O Khan, Tania Ghafourian, and Sameer Patil. 2024. Targets of weaponized Islamophobia: The impact of misinformation on the online practices of Muslims in the United States. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 8, CSCW1 (April 2024), 1–38. doi:10.1145/3637403
- [44] Reuben Kirkham. 2020. Using European human rights jurisprudence for incorporating values into design. In Proceedings of the 2020 ACM Designing Interactive Systems Conference (DIS '20). ACM, New York, NY, USA, 115–128. doi:10.1145/3357236.3395539
- [45] Yong Ming Kow, Yubo Kou, Bryan Semaan, and Waikuen Cheng. 2016. Mediating the undercurrents: Using social media to sustain a social movement. In Proceedings of the 2016 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2858036.2858186
- [46] Marvin Kowalewski, Christine Utz, Martin Degeling, Theodor Schnitzler, Franziska Herbert, Leonie Schaewitz, Florian M Farke, Steffen Becker, and Markus Dürrmuth. 2023. 52 weeks later: Attitudes towards COVID-19 apps for different purposes over time. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 7, CSCW2 (Sept. 2023), 1–45. doi:10.1145/3610042
- [47] Monika Blue Kwapisz, Avanya Kohli, and Prashanth Rajivan. 2024. Privacy concerns of student data shared with instructors in an online learning management system. In Proceedings of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems, Vol. 16. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–16. doi:10.1145/3613904.3642914
- [48] Jonathan Lazar. 2015. Public policy and HCI: making an impact in the future. interactions 22, 5 (Aug. 2015), 69–71. doi:10.1145/2807916
- [49] Jonathan Lazar, Jeff Johnson, and Harry Hochheiser. 2005. Policy at the interface: HCI and public policy. interactions 12, 6 (Nov. 2005), 13–14. doi:10.1145/1096554.1096576
- [50] Yong Liu, Jorge Goncalves, Denzil Ferreira, Bei Xiao, Simo Hosio, and Vassilis Kostakos. 2014. CHI 1994-2013: mapping two decades of intellectual progress through co-word analysis. In Proceedings of the SIGCHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2556288.2556969
- [51] Jamie Luguri and Lior Jacob Strahilevitz. 2021. Shining a light on dark patterns. The journal of legal analysis 13, 1 (March 2021), 43–109. doi:10.1093/jla/laaa006
- [52] Lassana Magassa, Meg Young, and Batya Friedman. 2017. Diverse voices: A how-to guide for facilitating inclusiveness in tech policy. Technical Report. The Tech Policy Lab at the University of Washington. https://techpolicylab.uw.edu/wp-content/uploads/2017/10/TPL_Diverse_Voices_How-To_Guide_2017.pdf
- [53] Jennifer Manuel and Clara Crivellaro. 2020. Place-based policymaking and HCI: Opportunities and challenges for technology design. In Proceedings of the 2020 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3313831.3376158
- [54] Maximilian Marsch, Jens Grossklags, and Sameer Patil. 2021. Won't you think of others?: Interdependent privacy in smartphone app permissions. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW2 (Oct. 2021), 1–35. doi:10.1145/3479581
- [55] J Nathan Matias and Merry Mou. 2018. CivilServant: Community-led experiments in platform governance. In Proceedings of the 2018 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3173574.3173583
- [56] Donald McMillan, Arvid Engström, Airi Lampinen, and Barry Brown. 2016. Data and the City. In Proceedings of the 2016 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2858036.2858434
- [57] Emily McReynolds, Sarah Hubbard, Timothy Lau, Aditya Saraf, Maya Cakmak, and Franziska Roesner. 2017. Toys that listen: A study of parents, children, and internet-connected toys. In Proceedings of the 2017 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3025453.3025735
- [58] Preeti Mudliar. 2018. Public WiFi is for men and mobile Internet is for women: Interrogating politics of space and gender around WiFi hotspots. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 2, CSCW (Nov. 2018), 1–24. doi:10.1145/3274395
- [59] Novia Nurain and Chia-Fang Chung. 2023. "I left my legacy, told my story": Understanding Older Adults' Tracking Practices to Promote Active Aging. In Proceedings of the 2023 ACM Designing Interactive Systems Conference. ACM, Pittsburgh, PA, USA. doi:10.1145/3563657.3596083
- [60] Matthew J Page, Joanne E McKenzie, Patrick M Bossuyt, Isabelle Boutron, Tammy C Hoffmann, Cynthia D Mulrow, Larissa Shamseer, Jennifer M Tetzlaff, Elie A Akl, Sue E Brennan, Roger Chou, Julie Glanville, Jeremy M Grimshaw, Asbjørn Hróbjartsson, Manoj M Lalu, Tianjing Li, Elizabeth W Loder, Evan Mayo-Wilson, Steve McDonald, Luke A McGuinness, Lesley A Stewart, James Thomas, Andrea C Tricco, Vivian A Welch, Penny Whiting, and David Moher. 2021. The PRISMA 2020 statement: an updated guideline for reporting systematic reviews. BMJ (Clinical research ed.) 372 (March 2021), n71. doi:10.1136/bmj.n71

- [61] Juho Pääkkönen, Matti Nelimarkka, Jesse Haapoja, and Airi Lampinen. 2020. Bureaucracy as a lens for analyzing and designing algorithmic systems. In Proceedings of the 2020 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3313831.3376780
- [62] Daniele Quercia, Neil Keith O'Hare, and Henriette Cramer. 2014. Aesthetic capital: what makes london look beautiful, quiet, and happy?. In Proceedings of the 17th ACM conference on Computer supported cooperative work & social computing. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2531602.2531613
- [63] Afsaneh Razi, Seunghyun Kim, Ashwaq Alsoubai, Gianluca Stringhini, Thamar Solorio, Munmun De Choudhury, and Pamela J Wisniewski. 2021. A human-centered systematic literature review of the computational approaches for online sexual risk detection. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW2 (Oct. 2021), 1–38. doi:10.1145/3479609
- [64] Yvonne Rogers. 2012. HCI theory: Classical, modern, and contemporary. Synthesis Lectures on Human-Centered Informatics, Vol. 14. Morgan & Claypool, San Rafael, CA.
- [65] Johnny Saldana. 2015. The Coding Manual for Qualitative Researchers (3rd ed.). SAGE Publications.
- [66] Bryan C Semaan, Scott P Robertson, Sara Douglas, and Misa Maruyama. 2014. Social media supporting political deliberation across multiple public spheres: towards depolarization. In Proceedings of the 17th ACM conference on Computer supported cooperative work & social computing. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2531602.2531605
- [67] Riyaj Shaikh, Anubha Singh, Barry Brown, and Airi Lampinen. 2024. Not just A dot on the map: Food delivery workers as infrastructure. In Proceedings of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems, Vol. 35. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–15. doi:10.1145/3613904.3641918
- [68] Ankit Shrestha, Danielle M Graham, Prakriti Dumar, Rizu Paudel, Kristin A Searle, and Mahdi Nasrullah Al-Ameen. 2022. Understanding the behavior, challenges, and privacy risks in digital technology use by nursing professionals. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 6, CSCW2 (Nov. 2022), 1–22. doi:10.1145/3555763
- [69] Robert Soden, David Lallemand, Perrine Hamel, and Karen Barns. 2021. Becoming interdisciplinary: Fostering critical engagement with disaster data. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW1 (April 2021), 1–27. doi:10.1145/3449242
- [70] Robert Soden and Leysia Palen. 2018. Informing crisis: Expanding critical perspectives in crisis informatics. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 2, CSCW (Nov. 2018), 1–22. doi:10.1145/3274431
- [71] Karen Sowon, Giulia Fanti, and J P Schnapper-Casteras. 2024. Tech regulation requires balancing security, privacy, and usability. <https://www.atlanticcouncil.org/blogs/econographics/tech-regulation-requires-balancing-security-privacy-and-usability/>. Accessed: 2024-10-1.
- [72] Anne Spaa, Abigail Durrant, Chris Elsdén, and John Vines. 2019. Understanding the Boundaries between Policymaking and HCI. In Proceedings of the 2019 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems (CHI '19, Paper 84). Association for Computing Machinery, New York, NY, USA, 1–15. doi:10.1145/3290605.3300314
- [73] Erik Stolterman. 2008. The nature of design practice and implications for interaction design research. International Journal of Design 2, 1 (Jan. 2008), 55–65. <https://www.ijdesign.org/index.php/IJDesign/article/viewFile/240/139>
- [74] Angelika Strohmayr, Mary Laing, and Rob Comber. 2017. Technologies and social justice outcomes in sex work charities: Fighting stigma, saving lives. In Proceedings of the 2017 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3025453.3025615
- [75] Vanessa Thomas, Christian Remy, Mike Hazas, and Oliver Bates. 2017. HCI and environmental public policy: Opportunities for engagement. In Proceedings of the 2017 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/3025453.3025579
- [76] Austin L Toombs. 2017. Hackerspace Tropes, Identities, and Community Values. In Proceedings of the 2017 Conference on Designing Interactive Systems (DIS '17). ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1079–1091. doi:10.1145/3064663.3064760
- [77] Lucy Van Kleunen, Brian Muller, and Stephen Volda. 2021. Wiring a city: A sociotechnical perspective on deploying urban sensor networks. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW1 (April 2021), 1–22. doi:10.1145/3449252
- [78] Tom van Nuenen, Jose Such, and Mark Cote. 2022. Intersectional experiences of unfair treatment caused by automated computational systems. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 6, CSCW2 (Nov. 2022), 1–30. doi:10.1145/3555546
- [79] Oleksandra Vereschak, Gilles Bailly, and Baptiste Caramiaux. 2021. How to evaluate trust in AI-assisted decision making? A survey of empirical methodologies. Proceedings of the ACM on human-computer interaction 5, CSCW2 (Oct. 2021), 1–39. doi:10.1145/3476068
- [80] Mark R. Warner. 2019. Deceptive Experiences To Online Users Reduction (DETOUR) Act. <https://www.congress.gov/bill/116th-congress/senate-bill/1084/text>
- [81] Pamela Wisniewski, Haiyan Jia, Na Wang, Saijing Zheng, Heng Xu, Mary Beth Rosson, and John M Carroll. 2015. Resilience mitigates the negative effects of adolescent internet addiction and online risk exposure. In Proceedings of the 33rd Annual ACM Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2702123.2702240
- [82] Pamela Wisniewski, Heng Xu, Mary Beth Rosson, Daniel F Perkins, and John M Carroll. 2016. Dear diary: Teens reflect on their weekly online risk experiences. In Proceedings of the 2016 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2858036.2858317
- [83] Pamela J Wisniewski, Heng Xu, Mary Beth Rosson, and John M Carroll. 2014. Adolescent online safety: the "moral" of the story. In Proceedings of the 17th ACM conference on Computer supported cooperative work & social computing. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2531602.2531696
- [84] Qian Yang, Richmond Y Wong, Thomas Gilbert, Margaret D Hagan, Steven Jackson, Sabine Junginger, and John Zimmerman. 2023. Designing Technology and Policy Simultaneously: Towards A Research Agenda and New Practice. In Extended Abstracts of the 2023 CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems (CHI EA '23, Article 343). Association for Computing Machinery, New York, NY, USA, 1–6. doi:10.1145/3544549.3573827
- [85] Qian Yang, Richmond Y Wong, Steven Jackson, Sabine Junginger, Margaret D Hagan, Thomas Gilbert, and John Zimmerman. 2024. The future of HCI-policy collaboration. In Proceedings of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems (CHI '24, Vol. 72). ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–15. doi:10.1145/3613904.3642771
- [86] Seraphina Yong, Leo Cui, Evan Suma Rosenberg, and Svetlana Yarosh. 2024. A change of scenery: Transformative insights from retrospective VR embodied perspective-taking of conflict with a close other. In Proceedings of the CHI Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA, 1–18. doi:10.1145/3613904.3642146
- [87] Amy X Zhang and Scott Counts. 2015. Modeling ideology and predicting policy change with social media: Case of same-sex marriage. In Proceedings of the 33rd Annual ACM Conference on Human Factors in Computing Systems. ACM, New York, NY, USA. doi:10.1145/2702123.2702193